Amy Carlton and Lily Hammer sell hand-made crafts to raise funds to help fight hunger.

Entrepreneurial teens fight hunger

Amy Carlton, 15, has a passion for fighting hunger.

"It's unfair that thousands of children go hungry when others are so fortunate," says Carlton. "I want to get people my age involved in making a difference."

Carlton began selling her hand-made jewelry to raise funds for OFB. And she got her friends and classmates involved, too. Soon Carlton was selling jewelry, note cards, bookmarks, scarves, hats and more.

Carlton formed her own nonprofit organization, Teens Fighting Hunger, which has already raised $4,000 through craft sales and donations.

Carlton's eyes light up as she talks about the potential she sees for Teens Fighting Hunger. She encourages teens to find their own creative ways to raise funds. Eventually, she hopes to see the project spread throughout the state.
